a mangé is given, and that evening, when the feast ends, dances are held. Two or three tonnelles are provided, the most important of these being the one where the Martinique cycle, the social dances most beloved by the ancestors, is danced. In one of the remaining two a European bal is held, and in the other are the vodun dancers. Thus even in connection with a commemorative Church mass for the dead the mangé morts and the dancing of African dances are included.

The institution of plural marriage, which is socially recognized though not legally sanctioned, is obviously African. Though the placée is held in respect and her place in society carries no reproach for herself or her children because of any connotation of immorality, it is of significance for an understanding of the manner of cultural change that prestige in marriage goes with the monogamic union blessed by the Church, and that the "wife" — the woman who is addressed as "Madame" — holds definitely higher social position than the placée. Officially the Haitian State is in accord with the position of the Church and recognizes only the European monogamic marriage. Socially, however, African plural marriage is not only tolerated but accepted as a matter of course, and in those instances where plural marriage takes on its most exuberant form, as when men of position have as many as six or seven placées in addition to a legal wife, its very size tends to give such a family group, or at least its head, the enviable esteem of his fellow-citizens.

Within the family, the deference toward older members and the duties and attitudes toward parents-in-law are African both in form and in spirit. The exaction of guarantees from a young man before marriage, and the necessity of his proving to the family of his fiancée that he can support her, are perhaps in their generalized form universals, but as found in Haiti show once more a retention of specific aboriginal traditions. On the other hand, such aspects of marriage as the formal lettre de demand sent when a match is arranged, or the
